

Jim Rehfeldt

There is always a probability that human error or equipment failure could lead to another spill disaster like the Exxon Valdez. It is important that the current spill prevention and response rules remain in effect. The current rules are working fine to protect Alaska's fisheries and coastal communities.

The effort to revise the rules is a waste of limited financial resources and should be stopped. Thanks